

The Relationship Expert

Joshua Seigal

The Relationship Expert

Joshua Seigal

Joshua Seigal is best known as a children's author and performer. He has published several volumes of poetry with publishers such as Bloomsbury and HarperCollins, and has been the recipient of the Laugh Out Loud Book Award and the People's Book Prize. Joshua's work for a 'grown up' audience has featured in publications such as Poetry Wales and Dust Magazine, and, of course, is showcased in the pamphlet you are currently reading.

Text Copyright © Joshua Seigal 2026.

ISBN 9781036980870

This collection is published under a Creative Commons Attribution-NonCommercial-NoDerivatives 4.0 International License (CC BY-NC-ND 4.0).

Joshua Seigal has asserted his right to be identified as the author of this Work in accordance with the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988. Absolutely no AI was used at any stage in the creation of this Work.

Buy Joshua a coffee:
<https://ko-fi.com/joshuaseigal>

www.joshuaseigal.co.uk

Contents

The Hope	5
Here We All Are	6
And So I Write	7
Football on the Radio	8
Second Birthday	9
My Grandma During the Cuban Missile Crisis	10
Digging Revisited	11
Flowers	12
The Letter	13
Maybe This Country	14
The Quotation	15
The Q&A	16
Leave the Baby to Cry	17
The Instructions	18
Grandpa David	19
The Divorce	20
Eating Swans	21
The Science	22
Tenacious	23
Victories	24
The Form	25
Otter	26
The Bungalow	27
The Relationship Expert	28
Acknowledgements	29

For Carrie, and Us

The Hope

In my hands, I'm holding this unbearably heavy ball of hope.
Watch me fold under its gravity.

Come, help heft this globe of hope for me, that I might rest awhile, and replenish my strength.

Here We All Are

My great-grandfather came over from Odessa packed into a box in the hold of a ship, with nothing but a hole through which to breathe.

He had a wife he hated, who hated him, and they set up a shop in the valleys of South Wales.
Above it, they slept in separate rooms.

When he laughed he made lokshen come out of his nose.
His wife had fled the Nazis just before the war,
but her polio meant she could never catch my grandpa or Auntie Helen when they were naughty.

Digging one day in the family archives, my dad discovered that my great-grandfather and his wife were also uncle and niece. Grandpa said that should this ever get out, he'd never speak to my dad again.

He bore his shame silently, like a lump in the throat that could not be got rid of. He'd take tots of vodka when he thought we weren't watching, and although he claimed not to believe in God

he prayed fervently every night, just in case.
All the books on his shelves were about Hitler or the Jews, and one time he swore he saw a ghost.

And like a ship the dread traverses generations, criss-crossing the strata back and forth, from my sister refusing to go to school to me huddled tight

in the doctor's room; from my mum with a husband who doesn't understand to my brother who vanished across the world. Here I am in a box of my own. Here we all are, trying to breathe, packed tight together, reaching through holes as our ghost ship lurches on endless seas.

And So I Write

the word LOVE in my diary, to remind myself of the underpinning of all the things I do.
I craft the letters with a ruler,

taking great pains to ensure that everything is smooth, straight, in order. I decorate the word with a border and I colour it all in, in a way

I haven't done since primary school.
I really want this word to stand out – LOVE.
The unassailable axiom; the uncaused cause;

that than which nothing greater can be conceived.
Until I realise that the letters aren't quite even.
Some of the lines are thicker than others and if you squint a bit you can see a slight smudge on the page. The letter O seems sort of squished, and although the word is still, recognisably, LOVE, it looks somewhat misformed, somehow. And so I carry now this buckled LOVE everywhere I go – in my diary, tucked tight in my rucksack – and this imperfection is part of everything I do, a bold, flawed LOVE on the pages of my days.

Football on the Radio

There he is, my dad, listening to the radio at the kitchen table. No internet back then, no mobile phones – I'm lying in my bed and he's downstairs following the match, adjusting the aerial to get the right signal, moving in and out through static and crackle.

Take it in: he's pounding his fists, a whoop and a clap when we score, a colourful curse when the run of play doesn't go our way.

And there I am, six years old, downstairs now on a school night, sitting on his knee, listening to the match on that little box and I can't quite work out what's going on but here we are, and he holds me tight, and we're winning, we're winning, we're winning.

Second Birthday

For his second birthday we made a tower on the living room floor, for him to knock over.
My sister, my mum and I, working together, assembled the building from colourful blocks.

In the morning – the idea went – he would be brought downstairs, would see the structure and would rush ahead to push it down.

There he is now, two years old, gleefully shoving over our wooden tower in the living room on the morning of his second birthday, the family all cheering, singing, congratulating.

What could we have known back then of the towers he would knock down since?

And how could we have comprehended that no cement would make the slightest difference?

My Grandma During the Cuban Missile Crisis

Kennedy is on the radio but she has teddies to find and bottoms to wipe.
Only twenty-four, she has three kids already, all under five,

and a husband working all hours of the day and night. What concern has she for Armageddon? No time to dwell, with that pile of laundry at the foot of the stairs. A division of labour – that's what this is. Let others sort the planet out; she has teeth to clean, stories to read, meals to prepare.

For what is the world for, if not for love? And where is love if not within these four little walls?

Digging Revisited

*'Between my finger and my thumb
The squat pen rests.
I'll dig with it.'* – Seamus Heaney

You see, I tried this and it doesn't work.
The effort it takes to make an adequate hole just isn't worth it. It did diddly squat.

I got mud under my fingernails and into the clicking mechanism of the biro.
The soil clogged it up.

What's more, the plants remain unplanted.
I spent all day digging with this stupid pen and now the garden's just a mess.

Let's do things properly. Let's get to work.
Give me that spade.
I'll write a poem with it.

Flowers

Someone should probably tell the kid to stop picking those flowers. Someone should probably tell him that they were planted with a loving hand, in this little space, for everyone to enjoy. I don't know where his parents are. It's just me on the bench and him by the flowerbed with a bunch of bluebells in his mitts. There he goes, riffing through the foliage, looking for more.

His glasses are held onto his head with one of those little straps, and I don't think I've ever seen a smile so wide. Someone should tell this kid to stop picking the flowers.

And there's me thinking: go ahead, my man – gather the colour while you can...

The Letter

A brown envelope arrived through my door today. Inside was a letter informing me I haven't been paying my air bill. I'd been breathing oxygen for ages, apparently, and not once had I coughed up for it. The letter said I now owed several million quid. There was a number to call in case of emergency, but I couldn't get through to a living person – just a voice telling me to press 6 three times for all other enquiries.

But I don't have several million quid,
I protested to myself, my heart nearly thumping its way out of my chest. Deep breaths, I thought.

Deep breaths. I took the letter out into the street.
The trees, with their sweet sweet leaves, smirked at me. I gave a gulp, felt my insides atrophy.

Maybe This Country

I'm on the tube at night, notebook open in front of me, absent-mindedly doodling, when I notice a little girl sitting next to me, staring right up into my face. She can't be more than three or four. Her mum, in a headscarf, sits opposite me. This girl keeps on staring at me so I turn to a fresh page in my notebook and draw a little cat, nothing too complicated, just a pair of circles with some ears, whiskers and a tail. I tear out the page and hand it to the girl, who laughs and says miaow miaow.

The mum whispers thank you in a foreign tongue and I like to imagine this girl and her mum with the cat, as they think, perhaps, in a tiny way, that maybe this country is not all bad.

The Quotation

'You never know how strong you are until being strong is your only choice.' – Bob Marley

He didn't actually say it.
I was looking online for the context and ChatGPT told me the quotation was commonly misattributed to Bob Marley.

There is no record of him ever having written or uttered those words

in any format at all.
Those 'inspirational' Instagram posts were mere simulacra of sentiment –

nothing more than bogus, a sham.
No one knows where the quote came from.
Turns out, Bob was not guiding me through some of my own darkest moments.

He wasn't holding his hand out to me,
telling me no cry.

It was all just empty words.
But then again, words are all I have,
as Boyzone famously said.

The Q&A

Good question. I mainly write poems because it's fun.
I've always loved words, and I kind of think poetry is a bit like playing with words – words are the Lego bricks and you make models out of them. Those are the poems.

And poetry also gives me the chance to perform, and to talk to lovely, happy, smiley people such as you.

That really gives me a buzz, and makes me feel proud.
And poems tend to be quite short, which suits my attention span.
With a poem you can get a tangible sense of achievement in a relatively short space of time. It's a good word – tangible.

I did say I love words; why not look that one up? Why did I become a poet? It's a good question, thank you for asking it.

Once everyone leaves assembly, I'll expand on my answer.
It's also because I went to school bang in the heart of the City of London, and every day I'd pass bankers and lawyers on their way to work in big shiny buildings, and something about it made me vow I'd never become like one of them.

Parents and grandparents taught me there was little choice but somehow deep inside I knew I'd rather die. Maybe it's also because I tell myself a child's laughter is the purest sign that my parents ain't laughing but I'm doing just fine...

These are some of the reasons I do what I do.
These are some of the reasons I don't do what I can't do.
Love and fear, they inhere in the same chamber of the heart.

Leave the Baby to Cry

The thing is, if you leave the baby to cry the baby will never stop crying. Sure, you will eventually hear a silence,

and at some point the baby will fall asleep,
but the crying never really stops.
The baby grows up, goes to school and gets a job, all the while crying in the deep recesses of its brain. The baby will learn to stifle the tears and muffle the pain, yes, but the crying will never truly go away. Hey – why not pick up the baby now, the one you’ve left to cry for so long it’s hurt the both of you? Tell the baby it’s OK, it’s OK, those dusty parenting books, they made a mistake – you don’t need to cry forever. You don’t need to cry forever.

The Instructions

have all been written down, but still she has trouble working the TV. She calls me up to say the device has turned itself off again, and could I come over and turn it back on? Just look at the notes Nana,

I say. I wrote the instructions down for you.

It's a similar story with the microwave, with its buttons seemingly designed to perplex her. The internet is a true enigma.

I just don't know how to manage, now that he's gone. The place is just so big, so empty. And the bills, she says. Michael used to sort the bills – now I don't know what to do. I try to assure her that all is OK, all is in order, the electricity won't run out,

the hot water won't suddenly go cold.
She hunches into herself. Tired now. Old.
She reuses a tea bag to make a weak tea.

Grandpa David

He agrees to meet on Hampstead Heath – a rainy Tuesday, the branches bare.
He unfurls his umbrella for us to share.

I become aware of the hip flask in his pocket,
the packet of fags lying close to his breast.
As we synchronise steps, he tells me it wasn't easy. None of it was easy – letting his fiancée's family believe he had a degree; getting up every morning and donning a suit, to pretend to my grandma that he had a job. It wasn't easy walking the streets every day until the sun went down, then returning to a woman who he knew didn't love him anyway.

Can you understand why I drink now?

Can you understand why I smoke?
Look, I'm sorry, he says – I'm touched that your middle name is David. And I'm sorry

I died before you were born. Shaking rain from brolly, taking fag from mouth, we part ways by the gates at Kenwood House, and glancing back – I couldn't swear but I think – he reaches for the hip flask to have just the one more drink.

The Divorce

Throughout it all, I kept wondering how she did it. The recalcitrant husband, the avaricious lawyers – how did she hold it all together? The full-time job, the two kids to bring up – how did she keep the plates spinning? I always imagined the kids would be the worst of it; the need to buttress two more lives against the weight of all hers faced – a back breaking harsh necessity. That was until I saw her with them both in the restaurant, the ease and art with which the light was flowing.

The kids are not the things that break our backs – they are the only things, throughout it all, that keep us going.

Eating Swans

I told her that the Queen is the only person in the country allowed to eat a swan. She looks up at me quizzically and asks why anyone would want to eat a swan. The Queen can do whatever she likes, I reply – she's the Queen.

So does that mean the Queen actually eats swans? she asks. I've no idea, I say – it's just that she's allowed to, if she wants.

So why can't I eat a swan? she asks. Would you want to eat a swan? I reply. No, she says, but I want to be allowed to eat a swan. I tell her that she is my queen, and for the rest of my life I will fight for her right to eat a swan. It's not fair, in this day and age, that just one privileged person, through a mere accident of birth, is allowed to eat swans whilst others are not. I will move mountains to ensure that she, my niece, my queen, grows up in a world where she can eat a swan, a world where swan-flesh is democratised. THERE WILL BE

NO MORE BARRIERS TO THIS DELICACY!!

Or maybe, she says, the Queen shouldn't be allowed to eat swans. Maybe no one should be allowed to eat swans.

I think you've got a point, I say, whilst sharpening my carving knife.

The Science

Then the ROCD latched onto percentages, correlations, success rates. I began to think of compatibility as something out there, to be discovered. I looked up the tests they say they have, found Wilson and Eysenck – all of that crap. Did we have what it takes?

Are we doing it right? What does it say in the books? What does it say online?
A million hotshots with a million bright ideas –

the stupid ones die off; the fittest survive.
Am I stupid? What did Finkel write?
Is this an equation, and have we been cracked?

Tenacious

I told you that ‘tenacious’ meant tough.
A few days later we went out to eat and you described your steak as tenacious.

That didn’t sound quite right – a person can be tenacious, but an inanimate slab of flesh, surely, can’t. I spent the rest of the meal absorbed in this. Then as we held hands on the way back, you told me about everything; about what happened and what he did.

I felt your hand in mine, and knew that you were still alive. You can call a piece of meat tenacious if you want.

Damn it, you can do whatever you like.
You can recreate the very foundations of Being.
If you want to call your steak tenacious,

then who am I to object?
And if I want to worship you as a god
then how, I pray, could that be wrong?

Victories

So you got up and fed the cat. That's something.
You hauled one leg, then the other, out of your pyjama bottoms, and you fought doggedly across the rugged terrain of the landing. You wielded your toothbrush like a club. You stood under the shower's strafe for as long as it took to deter the enemies under your skin, if just for a while. You got yourself dressed: trousers, T-shirt, socks – the kit. You sat for a bit then went to the shops for milk and fruit, whatever your tired gut could take. You wrote. That's something.

Even read a bit too. You talked with your wife – only half hearing through the hounding static, but you talked nonetheless. You watched some show about the Vikings. That's something.

That's something. And when the day was done you dropped heavily into bed, your mind bulging with a thousand tiny battles, a thousand mini victories.

The Form

She told me to sign the form but the name just wouldn't come out. From the tip of my pen

my own name simply refused to be written. I kept wondering what the hell was wrong with me, asked for more paper, tried again and again, but the letters wouldn't form the correct structure.

I wrote JOHN
instead of JOSHUA.
John is my dad's name.

My dad's. Not mine.
She gave me new paper.
Said I still had time.

Otter

My mum wants to know why I've never written a poem about her. She seems upset. Is it because all I've handed down to you is anxiety? she asks. No, I reply, you were a wonderful mum. I think back to the time in the old house when we were little, when she set up a little table in the garden, and she covered the table with newspaper, and gave us paint and paper to play with. She didn't have to do this.

I'm painting an otter, I said, even though the splodge on the page was nothing resembling an otter. It's the best otter I've ever seen, my mum replied. And she put it on the fridge, and it stayed there for years, and she passed on so much more to me than just anxiety – a mess can be an otter; a wounded leopard, love.

The Bungalow

I'm twelve years old, playing Super Mario on the N64.
You're seven, in a bungalow half way across the country, your step-grandfather doing bad things to you.

Sixteen years later we will meet. We will forge a door and step into marriage. Our roots will intertwine and I'll trace them back to those times, to the bungalow, where I wasn't there for you. I wasn't there to help you, to support you, to fight for you.

I was no less a child than you were, of course, but still –

I wasn't there. How could I have been there?
Let me hold you now, hold the child you once were.
Let me bear it with you. Let me shoulder some of the weight.

The Relationship Expert

now lies prostrate on our kitchen floor.
That PhD from Penn or wherever was not so penetrating when faced with the bat, was it?

I dealt the blows and you drew the blinds.

It took both our strength to haul the body to the bathroom. Bones can be tough to break –

I gave them a crack whilst you held the bin liner open, tying the knot in the way

I've come to know. And after it was all over, we both scrubbed the place clean with disinfectant. You called the dude's lab, said he wouldn't be in tomorrow; I drove us into the night to dispose of the remains.

I suppose that was the tough bit, the two of us fumbling our way through the dark, but you are my wife, I love you, and all else is bullshit.

Acknowledgements

‘Here We All Are’ – previously published in Poetry Wales

‘And So I Write’ – previously published in Masculinity: an anthology of modern voices (Broken Sleep Books) and in numerous other places

‘Football on the Radio’ (in an earlier version) – Highly Commended in the Poetry Wales Award

‘Flowers’ – previously published in Dust Magazine

‘The Letter’ – previously published in Poetry Poison: Humbug (Macmillan)

‘The Q&A’ – previously published on the Children’s Poetry Summit blog

‘Victories’ – previously published in Every Night is Full of Stars: More Meaningful Poems for Life (Bonnier Books)

“

I LOVE LOVE LOVE your collection. So witty and yet so deep too. I love the surreality of some of the poems and the variety but also the cohesion which I know is not an easy trick to pull off.

— CAROLE BROMLEY

•

What you've written is SO BEAUTIFUL!

— SHERYL PAUL

•

Reading through your poems was a tremendous experience. It was amazing how often the last lines of a poem were like a sudden punch. All of it was powerful and deep.

— ARNOLD ZUBOFF

THE RELATIONSHIP EXPERT

ISBN 978-1-0369-8087-0

9 781036 980870 >